Important distinction: packed vs crowded

These overlap strongly, especially for places.

crowded

= there are too many people or things for the available space

> “The train was crowded.”

「火車人很多，空間不足，十分擠迫。」

packed

= extremely full, often suggesting almost no room left

> “The train was packed.”

「火車擠得滿滿的, 幾乎沒有剩餘空間。」

So in many contexts:

packed is stronger than crowded.

A useful scale is:

busy → crowded → packed

approximately:

繁忙／人多 → 擠迫 → 擠得滿滿、幾乎爆滿

Important distinction: packed vs full

full

= all or almost all available capacity is occupied

packed

= filled very densely, often suggesting things or people are pressed closely together

Compare:

> “The train is full.”

「火車已滿／沒有多少空位。」

> “The train is packed.”

「火車擠滿了人, 乘客密集得幾乎沒有活動空間。」

So packed creates a stronger image of density and crowding.

Important distinction: pack vs package

pack

Can refer to:

- * the action of putting things into containers
- * a group of items sold together

> “a pack of batteries”

package

Usually refers to:

- * the wrapped/boxed item itself
- * a complete commercial/service combination

> “A package arrived this morning.”

「今早送來了一個包裹。」

> “a holiday package”

「旅遊套票／套裝行程」

They overlap around the idea of packaging, but they are not interchangeable in every context.

Important grammar note: pack / packed / packed

Unlike words such as full, packed often keeps a strong sense of something having been densely put into a limited space.

Compare:

> “The room was packed with people.”

「房間擠滿了人。」

> “The report was packed with information.”

「報告*包含大量資訊, 內容非常豐富*。」

Same underlying idea:

a limited space—physical or figurative—is densely filled.
