Important distinction 1: active vs energetic

These overlap, especially for people.

active

Emphasizes doing things, moving, participating.

- > an active child
- > 一個很好動的孩子

energetic

Emphasizes having lots of energy.

- > an energetic child
- > 一個精力充沛的孩子

A child can be energetic internally and therefore behave actively.

In your passage, both ideas are present, but active focuses on Leo's behaviour and level of activity.

Important distinction 2: active vs lively

active

often = physically doing a lot lively

often = energetic, cheerful, animated, full of life

- > a lively conversation
- > 熱烈活潑的對話

- > an active child
- > 好動的孩子

So lively has a stronger sense of liveliness or animation, whereas active is broader.

Important distinction 3: active vs busy

active

doing or participating in things

busy

having many things to do

> She is very active in the community.

她積極參與社區活動。

> She is very busy this week.

她這星期很忙。

A person can be active but not busy, or busy but physically inactive.

Important distinction 4: active vs proactive

These are not synonyms.

active

= involved, energetic, operating proactive

= acting in advance instead of merely reacting

> She takes an active role in the project.

她積極參與這個項目。

> She is proactive about solving problems.

她會在問題惡化前主動處理。

So proactive contains the additional idea of anticipating and initiating action.

Important distinction 5: active vs reactive

active

broadly means active, participating, or operating.

reactive

means responding after something happens.

> a reactive approach

被動回應式的方法

This is why proactive and reactive form a stronger contrast than active and reactive.

Important distinction 6: active vs activated

active

describes a current state.

> The alarm is active.

警報系統正處於啟用狀態。

activated

usually emphasizes that something has been switched on or triggered.

> The alarm was activated.

警報系統被啟動了。

So:

* active = state

* activated = result of activation / having been switched on

Important distinction 7: active vs activity

active

adjective

> an active child

一個好動的孩子

activity

noun

> physical activity

身體活動

Do not use:

>  an activity child

Important distinction 8: active vs alive

These can overlap only in a few technical contexts.

alive

= living, not dead

active

= moving, operating, participating, or currently functioning

> The animal is alive but not very active.

那隻動物仍然活着，但不太活躍。

So they are clearly different concepts.

Important distinction 9: active volcano vs erupting volcano

An active volcano does not have to be erupting at this exact moment.

It means the volcano is considered capable of erupting / has shown relevant activity.

An erupting volcano is one that is currently erupting.

So:

active ≠ currently erupting

Important distinction 10: active voice vs passive voice

Active

> Leo built the bridge.

Leo 造了那座橋。

The subject performs the action.

Passive

> The bridge was built by Leo.

那座橋*由 Leo 建造*。

The subject receives the action.

So:

* active voice = 主動語態

* passive voice = 被動語態

Family-extension note

Active is an excellent polysemy candidate because its central idea of being in action rather than idle or inactive extends naturally across several modern domains:

- * people who move a lot
- * participation in groups or activities
- * systems that are currently operating
- * illnesses or volcanoes that are currently active
- * chemistry and biology
- * military service
- * grammar
- * digital accounts/users
- * learning expressions such as active vocabulary and active listening

However, these should still be grouped conservatively. For example, active child, active member, and active lifestyle are contextually different, but they all preserve the broad idea of *doing, participating, or being engaged rather than inactive.

For your original sentence

Here:

active = 好動的；活躍的；精力充沛並經常活動的

The sentence does not mean:

- * politically active
- * technically active
- * active account
- * active volcano
- * active ingredient

It specifically describes a child's behaviour and physical/activity level.

A natural Traditional Chinese rendering is:
