Important distinction 1: atmosphere vs mood

These are close but not identical.

mood

can describe:

* one person's emotional state

* a group's/place's emotional tone

atmosphere

usually describes the overall feeling of a place or situation

> I'm in a good mood.

我心情很好。

> The classroom had a friendly atmosphere.

課堂氣氛很友善。

So in your passage, atmosphere is better than mood because the speaker is remembering the classroom as a whole.

Important distinction 2: atmosphere vs environment

environment

broad surroundings or conditions.

the emotional or sensory feeling those surroundings create.

> a safe learning environment

安全的學習環境

> a relaxed classroom atmosphere

輕鬆的課堂氣氛

Important distinction 3: atmosphere vs ambience

Very close.

common and broad.

ambience

usually focuses more on the sensory/emotional character of a place, especially restaurants, hotels, shops, etc.

> a warm atmosphere

溫暖氣氛

> a stylish ambience

有格調的環境氣氛

Ambience sounds a little more aesthetic.

Important distinction 4: atmosphere vs feeling

feeling

very broad and can be internal/personal.

atmosphere

is usually shared or perceivable in the place/situation.

> I had a strange feeling.

我有一種奇怪感覺。

> There was a strange atmosphere.

現場有一種奇怪氣氛。

Important distinction 5: atmosphere vs tone

tone

often refers to the emotional style of:

- * a conversation
- * writing
- * speech
- * interaction

atmosphere

broader, covering the whole setting.

> the tone of the discussion

討論的語氣 / 基調

> the atmosphere in the meeting room

會議室的氣氛

Important distinction 6: atmosphere vs air

This can be tricky because air can also mean an impression or manner.

atmosphere

general mood of a place.

air

can mean the literal gas, or a particular impression:

> an air of confidence

自信的氣息 / 神態

So:

> a tense atmosphere

緊張氣氛

is more natural than:

> a tense air

though the latter can exist in literary contexts.

Important distinction 7: create atmosphere vs create an atmosphere

create an atmosphere

very normal and countable when specifying a type:

> create a relaxed atmosphere

營造輕鬆氣氛

create atmosphere

less common in ordinary learner English unless used more stylistically.

So for learners, prefer:

create a/an + adjective + atmosphere

Important distinction 8: atmosphere = feeling vs atmosphere = gas layer

These are genuinely different senses.

Social/emotional

> the classroom atmosphere

課堂氣氛

Scientific

> the Earth's atmosphere

地球大氣層

The context makes the meaning clear.

Important distinction 9: atmospheric = 大氣的 vs atmospheric = 有氣氛的

Same adjective, two very different uses.

Scientific

> atmospheric pressure

大氣壓力

Aesthetic

> an atmospheric café

一間很有氣氛的咖啡店

This is a classic domain-based polysemy split.

Important distinction 10: classroom atmosphere vs classroom environment

classroom atmosphere

focuses on:

- * emotional tone
- * friendliness
- * tension
- * interaction

classroom environment

broader:

- * physical setting
- * safety
- * resources
- * teaching conditions
- * social climate

So environment includes more than atmosphere.

Family-extension note

Atmosphere has two major modern branches:

1. emotional / social atmosphere

- * classroom atmosphere
- * tense atmosphere
- * relaxed atmosphere
- * create an atmosphere

2. scientific atmosphere

- * Earth's atmosphere
- * upper atmosphere
- * atmospheric pressure
- * atmospheric conditions

The adjective atmospheric then branches again:

- * scientific → atmospheric pressure
- * aesthetic/emotional → atmospheric music, atmospheric restaurant

These meanings are clearly established and worth teaching separately.

For your original sentence

> I first met him when I was in junior secondary school, and even now I can still remember the atmosphere in his classroom very clearly.

Here:

atmosphere = 課堂裏整體的感覺、情緒和互動氛圍

The speaker is not remembering the physical air in the room 😊. They mean the feeling of being in Mr Chan's class—how lively, engaging, serious, relaxed, or memorable it felt.

A natural Traditional Chinese rendering is:

> 直到現在，我仍然很清楚記得他課堂上的那種氣氛 / 氛圍。

For this passage, 「課堂氣氛」 is the cleanest translation.
