Meaning in this passage

> Even so, that is part of his charm.

Here, charm means:

an attractive or endearing quality that makes someone pleasant and likeable — 魅力；討人喜歡之處；可愛之處

The speaker has just admitted that Leo can sometimes be a little stubborn. But instead of treating that imperfection as something that ruins his personality, the speaker says it is actually part of what makes Leo distinctive and lovable.

他天生就很有魅力、很會討人歡心，跟誰都合得來。

MCQ-ready definition:

charmer = 很有魅力、很會令別人喜歡自己的人

Important distinction 1: charm vs attractiveness

attractiveness

broadly means being appealing or attractive.

charm

usually suggests a warmer, more personal kind of appeal that makes someone or something likeable.

A person can be physically attractive without having much charm.

Important distinction 2: charm vs charisma

These overlap but differ in scale and feel.

charm

often warm, pleasant, personable, intimate.

charisma

strong personal magnetism, often associated with leadership or public presence.

> personal charm

個人魅力

> political charisma

領袖魅力 / 感染力

Charm does not require a powerful public presence.

Important distinction 3: charm vs beauty

beauty

primarily concerns attractiveness, especially visual/aesthetic quality.

charm

can come from:

- * personality
- * imperfection
- * manner
- * atmosphere
- * character

This matters in your passage: Leo's slight stubbornness can be part of his charm, but it would make little sense to call it part of his beauty.

Important distinction 4: charm vs appeal

appeal

very broad attractiveness or ability to interest people.

charm

usually more affectionate and personality-based.

> The simplicity of the game has broad appeal.

遊戲的簡單特點具有廣泛吸引力。

> The old café has a lot of charm.

那間老咖啡店很有韻味。

Important distinction 5: charming vs charmingly

charming

adjective:

> a charming child

討人喜歡的孩子

charmingly

adverb:

> He smiled charmingly.

他笑得很迷人 / 討喜。

Important distinction 6: charm someone vs flatter someone

charm someone

cause them to like you, often naturally or through pleasant behaviour.

flatter someone

praise them, sometimes excessively, especially to please or influence them.

You can charm someone without explicitly praising them.

Important distinction 7: charm someone vs persuade someone persuade convince someone through reasons, arguments, pressure, etc.

charm

win cooperation through likeability or pleasant behaviour.

> She persuaded him with evidence.

她用證據說服他。

> She charmed him into agreeing.

她靠魅力和討好的方式令他答應。

Important distinction 8: charm vs lucky charm

charm = 魅力

abstract quality:

> her natural charm

她自然的魅力

a charm = 護身符 / 吊飾

countable object:

> a lucky charm

幸運符

So countability and context are important.

Important distinction 9: charm bracelet vs lucky charm

A charm bracelet contains small decorative charms.

Those charms do not necessarily have magical or lucky meaning.

So:

* bracelet charm → 小吊飾

* lucky charm → 幸運符

They overlap historically but differ in modern use.

Important distinction 10: part of someone's charm

This expression often allows even a small imperfection to be viewed affectionately.

> His awkward laugh is part of his charm.

他那有點笨拙的笑聲反而是他可愛之處的一部分。

It means:

this characteristic helps make the person distinctive and likeable

This is exactly what is happening with Leo's stubbornness.

Important distinction 11: charming vs cute

cute

often means physically attractive in a sweet, small, youthful way.

charming

means appealing because of manner, personality, atmosphere, or style.

Leo can be both, but charm is the broader personality concept.

Important distinction 12: charm vs spell

In magical contexts:

charm

can mean a magical spell or magically protective object.

spell

is the broader ordinary fantasy word for words/actions producing magic.

So:

> cast a spell

is more general than:

> use a protective charm

Family-extension note

Charm is a particularly nice polysemy family because it contains several clearly established branches:

1. personal or aesthetic attraction

- * personal charm
- * part of his charm
- * a charming village

2. verb: win someone's affection

- * charm someone
- * charm someone into doing something

3. small object

- * charm bracelet
- * lucky charm

4. magic

- * protective charm
- * charm something

5. figurative idioms

- * work like a charm
- * charmed life
- * third time's the charm

The original passage uses the abstract attractiveness/personality sense. The small-object and magical senses are genuinely distinct enough to deserve separate treatment rather than merely being treated as contextual translations.

Master comparison

Form / expression	Traditional Chinese	Core idea
-----	-----	-----
charm (personality)	魅力；討人喜歡之處	personal appeal
part of his charm	他魅力的一部分	endearing characteristic
personal charm	個人魅力	appealing personality
natural charm	天生魅力	effortless appeal
charm (place)	韻味；迷人之處	appealing quality
old-world charm	古典韻味	traditional appeal
rustic charm	鄉村質樸魅力	simple rural appeal
charm someone	迷住；討人歡心	win affection
charm someone into X	哄 / 討好得某人做 X	influence through charm
turn on the charm	施展魅力	deliberately charm
charm offensive	魅力攻勢	win support through friendliness
charming	迷人的；討喜的	pleasantly attractive
charm (object)	小吊飾 / 護身符	small symbolic object
lucky charm	幸運符	object believed to bring luck
charm bracelet	吊飾手鍊	bracelet with charms
charm (magic)	魔法；魔咒	supernatural spell
work like a charm	非常有效	work perfectly
third time's the charm	第三次會成功	hopeful idiom
charmed life	特別幸運的人生	protected/lucky life
charmer	很會討人喜歡的人	charming person

For your original sentence

> Of course, no child is perfect, and he can be a bit stubborn once in a while. Even so, that is part of his charm.

Here:

charm = 魅力；討人喜歡、令人疼愛的特質

And:

part of his charm = 正正是他可愛 / 討人喜歡的一部分

The interesting nuance is that the speaker has just mentioned a flaw:

> Leo can be a bit stubborn.

But then reframes it affectionately:

> that is part of his charm.

So charm here means that even Leo's slight imperfection contributes to the distinctive personality that makes people like him.

A very natural Traditional Chinese rendering is:

> 當然，沒有小孩是完美的，他偶爾也會有點固執。即使如此，這其實也是他可愛之處的一部分。

For this context, 「可愛之處」 may actually capture the emotional nuance even better than the more literal 「魅力」.
