Important distinction 1: house vs home

This is the biggest learner distinction.

house

usually emphasizes the building.

home emphasizes where someone lives and belongs emotionally.

> They bought a new house.

他們買了一間新房子。

> This place feels like home.

這地方讓我有家的感覺。

A house can be empty; a home carries a stronger personal/living sense.

Important distinction 2: house vs building building

any structure with walls/roof.

specifically a building designed mainly for people to live in.

An office tower is a building, but not normally a house.

Important distinction 3: house vs apartment / flat

house

usually an independent residential building.

flat / apartment

one residential unit inside a larger building.

In Hong Kong, everyday Chinese 「屋企」 may refer to either, but English house is more specific.

Important distinction 4: at my house vs at home

at my house

focuses on the location/building.

at home

focuses on being in your own residence.

> Come to my house.

來我家。

> I'm at home.

我在家。

Important distinction 5: house noun vs house verb

Noun

> a large house

一間大房子

Verb

> the building houses a museum

這棟建築容納一間博物館

This is a major POS shift.

Important distinction 6: house people vs accommodate people

house

provide a place to live/stay.

accommodate broader: provide space/lodging for.

> house homeless families

安置無家者家庭 > accommodate 500 guests

容納 500 位賓客

There is overlap, but house has stronger residential associations.

Important distinction 7: house something vs contain something contain simply have something inside.

house

often suggests the building/place is specifically used to hold, display, protect, or accommodate it.

> The museum houses rare manuscripts.

博物館收藏珍貴手稿。

This sounds more institutional than simply contains.

Important distinction 8: housing vs house

a house

one residential building.

housing

housing in general / supply of residences.

> We need more houses.

我們需要更多房子。

> We need more affordable housing.

我們需要更多可負擔住房。

Housing is normally uncountable in this sense.

Important distinction 9: housing = homes vs housing = casing

Residential

> affordable housing

可負擔住房

Technical

> motor housing

摩打外殼

These are genuinely distinct noun meanings.

Important distinction 10: household vs family

family

people related by blood, marriage, etc.

household

people living together in one residence.

A household may include unrelated people; family members may live in separate households.

Important distinction 11: household name does not mean a person's family name

A household name means:

widely known by the general public not:

> 家庭姓氏

For example:

> She became a household name.

= 她變得家喻戶曉。

Important distinction 12: house = company vs company company

broad commercial organization.

house

especially established in certain sectors:

- * publishing house
- * fashion house
- * auction house

So this is partly industry-specific lexicalization.

Important distinction 13: House capitalization

lowercase house

ordinary home/building.

capitalized House

often appears in official names:

- * House of Commons
- * House of Lords
- * House of Windsor

Capitalization can signal a proper institutional/family name.

Important distinction 14: house = audience vs house = building

In theatre:

> a full house

means all audience seats are occupied.

It does not mean a residential house full of people.

This is a genuine institutional/performance extension.

Important distinction 15: full house = audience vs poker

Theatre

> We played to a full house.

滿座。

Poker

> I had a full house.

我有葫蘆牌。

Same expression, completely different domains.

Important distinction 16: house wine vs wine made in a house

House wine is lexicalized:

the restaurant/bar's standard or recommended wine

It does not mean wine physically made inside someone's home.

Important distinction 17: house music

House in house music is not normally interpreted from the residential-building sense by learners. It is a lexicalized genre name.

So:

> house music

= 浩室音樂 not:

> 家庭音樂

Family-extension note

House has several strong modern branches:

1. residential building

- * a house
- * house prices
- * at someone's house

2. institution

- * House of Commons
- * publishing house
- * fashion house

3. dynasty/family

- * House of Windsor

4. school group

- * school house

5. theatre/audience

- * full house
- * bring the house down

6. verb: accommodate

- * house families
- * house a collection

7. housing family

- * housing
- * public housing
- * machine housing

8. household family

- * household
- * household goods
- * household name

9. lexicalized compounds

- * house style
- * house wine
- * house music
- * house arrest

The core metaphor is often:

a place that contains or shelters something which extends naturally from people → institutions → collections → machinery.

But some compounds such as house music are lexicalized enough to teach separately.

For your selected word

House does not appear directly in this particular English passage—the passage uses home and room, both of which are already mapped in your database.

But since you explicitly chose house, the primary learner meaning is:

house = 房子；供人居住的建築物

The biggest distinction to keep especially clear is:

> house = physical residential building

> home = where someone lives/belongs; often carries emotional meaning

And from the polysemy perspective, the strongest additional branches are House = 議院, house = 公司 / 機構, house = 家族, house = 容納, housing = 住房 / 外殼, and house = theatre audience / full house.
