Important distinction 1: item vs thing

thing

extremely broad and everyday.

item

more specific and often suggests something is being treated as one unit in a collection, list, shop, or category.

> Put your things away.

把你的東西收好。

> Each item has a number.

每件物品都有編號。

So item often sounds more organized or classificatory.

Important distinction 2: item vs object

object

physical thing.

item

can be physical or abstract.

> a physical object

實體物件

> an agenda item

議程項目

You cannot naturally call an agenda item an “object.”

Important distinction 3: item vs product

product

something made/provided for sale.

item

one individual product/unit.

> This product comes in three sizes.

這款產品有三個尺寸。

> This item is out of stock.

這件貨品缺貨。

So product emphasizes type/category; item often emphasizes individual unit/listing.

Important distinction 4: item vs article

In retail or formal English, article can also mean an individual object.

item

much more common in everyday shopping.

article

more formal or appears in compounds such as article of clothing.

> item of clothing

> article of clothing

Both work, but item is more general.

Important distinction 5: item vs entry

item

an individual thing/topic.

entry

something specifically entered into:

- * a list
- * database
- * competition
- * dictionary

> an item on the agenda

議程項目

> a dictionary entry

字典條目

Important distinction 6: item vs point

item

a separately listed topic or object.

point

an idea, argument, or specific detail.

> agenda item

議程項目

> discussion point

討論要點

They may overlap in meetings but differ in focus.

Important distinction 7: item vs piece

piece

often one portion or part of something.

item

one independently classified unit.

> a piece of furniture

一件家具

> an item on a list

清單上一項

For many uncountable nouns, piece is natural where item is not:

> a piece of advice

> an item of advice Δ possible only in specialized contexts, much less natural

Important distinction 8: item of information vs piece of information

Both are possible.

piece of information

more natural in ordinary conversation.

item of information

more formal/structured and treats the information as one recordable unit.

So item often suggests database/list-like organization.

Important distinction 9: luxury item vs luxury good

Very close.

luxury item

one particular object/product.

luxury goods

broader economic/commercial category.

> a luxury item

一件奢侈品

> luxury goods

奢侈品類別

Important distinction 10: menu item vs dish

dish

actual prepared food.

menu item

anything independently listed on the menu, including:

* drinks

* side dishes

* desserts

So menu item is broader.

Important distinction 11: news item vs article

news item

one piece of news content, possibly very short and in any medium.

article

usually a written piece.

A TV news item is not normally called an article.

Important distinction 12: collector's item vs valuable item

valuable item

worth a lot of money.

collector's item

desirable to collectors because of rarity/history/special status.

A collector's item may become valuable, but value is not the only criterion.

Important distinction 13: itemized vs detailed

itemized

broken into separate named/priced items.

detailed contains lots of information.

A bill can be detailed without every cost being formally itemized.

Family-extension note

Item has a very consistent core:

one individual unit treated separately from a larger group

From that, English develops several branches:

1. physical object

- * personal item
- * luxury item

2. commercial product

- * this item is out of stock
- * food item

3. list/agenda unit

- * item on a list
- * agenda item

4. information/content unit

- * item of information
- * news item

5. financial unit

- * line item

6. special collectible

- * collector's item

7. verb family

- * itemize
- * itemized receipt

So the meanings are related through the idea of separating one thing out as an individual unit, but learners still need the Chinese translation to shift naturally according to context.

For your original sentence

> It was not a luxury item or anything expensive.

Here:

item = 物品 ; 一件商品

And:

luxury item = 奢侈品

The sentence deliberately contrasts the album's financial value with its later emotional value:

- > not a luxury item
- > not expensive
- > but deeply meaningful

A natural Traditional Chinese rendering is:

> 它不是甚麼奢侈品，也不是甚麼昂貴的東西。

For this passage, 「物品 / 商品」 is the underlying sense, while the whole phrase luxury item is most naturally translated simply as 「奢侈品」.
