Important distinction 1: open vs opened

open

can be an adjective:

> The door is open.

門開着。 opened usually describes the action/result:

> She opened the door.

她打開了門。

Usually:

>  The door is open.

not:

> ? The door is opened.

unless you mean a passive action:

> The door is opened every morning at six.

門每天早上六點被打開。

Important distinction 2: open vs close

Basic opposite pair:

* open → 開

* close → 關

> open the window

> 打開窗

> close the window

> 關上窗

But abstract uses do not always have a simple close opposite.

Important distinction 3: open vs unlock unlock remove the lock.

open

physically move something from closed to open.

> I unlocked the door but didn't open it.

我解了鎖，但沒有把門打開。

So:

unlock ≠ open

Important distinction 4: open vs turn on

For machines:

turn on

start electrical operation.

> turn on the computer

開電腦

access a file/program/page.

> open the file

開啟檔案

So:

> open the computer is generally not the normal expression for switching it on.

Important distinction 5: open vs start

open a meeting

formally begin it.

start a meeting

ordinary neutral wording.

Both can work, but open often sounds more formal or ceremonial.

Important distinction 6: open shop vs open a shop

open a shop

establish/start a shop.

> She opened a shop last year.

她去年開了一間店。

the shop opens at nine begins business for the day.

> The shop opens at nine.

店舖九點開門營業。

Different meanings despite similar wording.

Important distinction 7: open to vs open for

open to + people/ideas

accessible/receptive

> open to the public

向公眾開放

> open to suggestions

願意接受建議

open for + activity/business

available for a purpose

> open for business

開始營業

> open for applications

接受申請

Important distinction 8: open-minded vs open

open

broad: frank, accessible, available, receptive.

open-minded

specifically willing to consider unfamiliar or different ideas.

> She's very open about her feelings.

她很坦率。

> She's very open-minded about different lifestyles.

她思想很開明。

Important distinction 9: open person vs outgoing person

open person

willing to share thoughts/feelings honestly.

outgoing person

sociable and confident with people.

Someone can be open but quiet, or outgoing but private.

Important distinction 10: open question vs open-ended question

open question

an issue still unresolved.

> Whether it will work is an open question.

是否有效仍未有定論。 open-ended question

a question allowing many possible answers.

> “How did you feel?” is an open-ended question.

「你感覺如何？」是一條開放式問題。

Important distinction 11: open secret

This looks contradictory but is idiomatic.

* secret → supposedly hidden

* open secret → widely known but not formally acknowledged

So it should be learned as a lexicalized expression.

Important distinction 12: open up vs open

Literal

Often interchangeable:

> open the box

> open up the box

But open up can add a sense of fuller opening.

Emotional

Only open up naturally means:

> 敞開心扉

> He finally opened up.

He finally began talking honestly about his feelings.

Important distinction 13: opening vs beginning

beginning

general start.

opening

often the first part of:

* a film

* speech

* event

* performance

and can also mean a hole or vacancy.

So opening is much more polysemous.

Family-extension note

Open is a very strong polysemy family because one central physical concept—

not closed / make something not closed

—extends widely into abstract English.

Major branches include:

1. physical access

- * open a door
- * window is open

2. start / activate access

- * open a file
- * open a shop
- * open a meeting

3. availability

- * open to the public
- * open position
- * open access

4. mental/emotional receptiveness

- * open to ideas
- * open-minded
- * open about feelings

5. unresolved / unrestricted

- * open question
- * open competition
- * keep options open

6. related noun `opening`

- * physical opening
- * beginning
- * job opening
- * opportunity

The semantic metaphor is especially productive:

physical barrier is removed

→ access becomes possible

→ ideas, people, opportunities, feelings, or choices become accessible

For your original sentence

> Being with him feels like opening a window and letting fresh air into a stuffy room.

Here:

open = 打開原本關閉的東西

Literally:

> opening a window = 打開窗戶

But the whole sentence is metaphorical:

closed window

→ stale, stuffy room

→ window opens

→ fresh air enters

→ atmosphere changes

Likewise:

adult routine

→ life feels stale/repetitive

→ time with Leo

→ life feels fresh and imaginative again

So open itself is using the ordinary physical sense, while the sentence as a whole turns that physical action into a metaphor for emotional freshness and renewed perspective.
