Important distinction: save vs rescue

rescue

focuses strongly on removing someone from immediate danger.

save

is broader and can mean:

- * rescue
- * preserve
- * avoid waste
- * store data
- * save money

> rescue someone from a fire

> save someone's life

Both can overlap, but save has much wider range.

Important distinction: save vs keep

keep

means continue to have or retain something.

save

often implies keeping it for later or preventing it from being lost/used.

> "Keep this book."

= 保留這本書。

> "Save this book for me."

= 幫我把這本書留起來。

Important distinction: save vs store

store

means put something away for future use.

save

can mean store, especially data, but also emphasizes not losing or spending it.

> store food
> save money
> save a file

Different typical collocations.

Important distinction: save vs spend

save

= keep money/resources for future use

spend

= use money/resources now

> save money ↔ spend money

This contrast is central to the financial sense.

Important distinction: save vs avoid avoid

means prevent something from happening to you or keep away from it.

save someone something

means make it unnecessary for them to experience or spend that thing.

Compare:

> “This method avoids stress.”

= 這方法避免壓力。

> “This method saves me stress.”

= 這方法替我省去 / 免去壓力。

The second emphasizes the benefit to a person.

Countability note

The noun save is countable mainly in sports:

- > a great save
- > two saves

But savings is normally plural when referring to accumulated money:

- > my savings

Not usually:

- > my saving

when you mean banked money.

This distinction is useful for learners.

Family-extension note

The practical modern family includes:

- * save
- * saved
- * saving
- * savings
- * saver

Useful constructions include:

- * save a life
- * save something for later
- * save money
- * save time
- * save someone trouble
- * save a file
- * make a save
- * save for
- * save for a holiday
- * save for later

The Golden Manual says domain uses, grammatical constructions, and family forms should be audited broadly, while closely related contexts should still be merged under unified semantic concepts.

For your original sentence

> “That mindset has saved me a lot of stress...”

The exact meaning is:

save someone something = 使某人不用承受或花費原本可能需要承受 / 花費的東西

So:

> save me a lot of stress

= 替我免去很多不必要的壓力 / 令我少承受很多壓力

This is not the literal save = rescue sense.

For your database, I would count 6 genuinely useful core meanings for save:

1. rescue / preserve from harm or loss
2. keep something for future use
3. keep money rather than spend it
4. reduce/avoid spending time, money, effort, trouble, or stress
5. store digital data
6. sports — prevent a score

I would keep formal save = except as a lower-priority additional use, merge save a forest/building into #1, and treat savings / saver as family extensions rather than inflate the base-word count.
