> “His wealth raised his social station.”

「他的財富提高了他的社會*地位*。」

*station = 一個人在社會階層或制度中的身份 / 位置

Register:

> formal / somewhat old-fashioned

Useful for recognition, but lower priority for production.

Important distinction: station vs stop

This is essential for transport.

station

is usually a larger fixed transport facility, especially for trains.

stop

is simply a designated point where a bus/tram/etc. stops.

> train station = 火車站

> bus stop = 巴士站牌 / 普通巴士站

> bus station = 巴士總站 / 大型交通設施

So station usually suggests more infrastructure.

Important distinction: station vs terminal

station

can occur anywhere along a route.

terminal

often means:

> a larger facility or an endpoint of transport/service.

An airport has:

> terminals

while a railway system has:

> stations.

A bus terminal and bus station may overlap.

Important distinction: station vs base

These overlap strongly.

station

often means:

> an established operational post/facility for a particular service.

base

emphasizes:

> the central location from which people or operations work.

- > research station
- > military base

Both can translate as 「基地」 depending on context.

Important distinction: station vs centre

station

often emphasizes:

- > a fixed operational post where personnel/equipment are located.

centre

often emphasizes:

- > a place where an activity/service is concentrated.

For example:

- > rescue centre

may focus on providing rescue-related services/care.

- > rescue station

would more strongly suggest an operational base for rescue personnel/equipment.

Important distinction: space station vs spacecraft

space station

= a long-term facility/base in orbit.

spacecraft

= a vehicle designed to travel through space.

So:

> station = facility/base
> spacecraft = vehicle

Leo is imagining the living room as the first.

Important distinction: station vs platform

At a railway station:

station

= the entire transport facility.

platform

= the raised area beside the track where passengers board the train.

So:

is broader than:

> “Meet me on platform 3.”

Important distinction: station vs channel — broadcasting

station

= broadcasting organization/service or frequency identity.

channel

is especially common for:

- * television channels
- * numerical broadcast channels
- * online content channels

> radio station

> TV station

but:

> change the TV channel

is usually more natural than:

> change the TV station.

Important distinction: radio station vs radio frequency

station

= the broadcaster/service.

frequency

= the technical radio-wave frequency it uses.

For example, a station may broadcast on:

> 101.2 MHz.

So they are related, but not identical.

Important distinction: power station vs power plant

They mostly overlap.

power station

especially common in British English.

power plant

especially common in American English.

Both generally mean:

> 發電廠 / 發電站

Important distinction: station — noun vs station — verb

Noun:

> “The police station is nearby.”

= 警署在附近。

Verb:

> “Police were stationed outside.”

= 警員被派駐在外面。

The verb develops naturally from the idea of:

> assigning someone a fixed station/post.

Important distinction: station someone vs send someone

send simply means:

> cause someone to go somewhere.

station

means:

> formally assign someone to remain at a particular place for a duty.

> “They sent a guard outside.”

could be temporary.

> “They stationed a guard outside.”

suggests an assigned post.

Important distinction: station vs position

position

is extremely broad:

> physical location, job, stance, rank, situation.

station

as “post” specifically implies:

> an assigned location for work/duty.

So:

> “Return to your station.”

sounds like:

> 回到你的工作崗位。

Important distinction: station = transport facility vs station = operational facility

Compare:

> train station

= people/vehicles arrive and depart.

> police station

= police officers work from an operational base.

> weather station

= instruments collect weather data.

> space station

= astronauts live/work in space.

These Chinese translations differ, but they share a very useful underlying concept:

> a fixed place established for a particular activity or service

So we should not artificially treat every compound as a wholly unrelated meaning.

Important distinction: social station vs station as place

Physical/operational:

> “He works at the station.”

= 他在站 / 局工作。

Social:

> “people of high station”

= 社會地位高的人。

The social sense conceptualizes society as a structured system in which someone occupies a particular “position.”

It is much less common in modern everyday speech.

Family-extension note

Station is a strong moderate polysemy word, especially because one broad idea—a fixed position/base for a particular function—has become productive across many domains:

- * train/bus station
- * police/fire station
- * research station
- * space station
- * radio/TV station
- * weather station
- * power station
- * charging station

There are then two genuinely important additional branches:

- * station — verb = formally place someone at a post
- * station — social position/rank (formal/lower-frequency)

The curation should therefore avoid counting every compound as a separate meaning of bare station. Most preserve the same functional-base concept, even though Traditional Chinese naturally uses different words such as 「站」「局」「台」「基地」. This follows the manual's rule that different domain or Chinese translations alone do not justify separate semantic meanings.

For your original sentence

> “One minute, the living room becomes a space station, and the next it turns into a jungle...”

The exact meaning is:

station = 為特定用途而設立、供人員和設備長時間停留及運作的固定設施 / 基地

Therefore:

> space station

= 「太空站」

Leo is imagining the living room not merely as:

> space = 太空

but as an entire operational base in space where people might live, work, explore, and carry out missions.

So this is conceptually close to:

* research station = 研究站

* weather station = 氣象站

rather than only:

* train station = 火車站

The common semantic idea is:

> a designated place established for a particular function.
