Important distinction: take vs bring

This is one of the biggest learner contrasts.

take

usually means movement away from the speaker/current point:

> “Take this book to your room.”

「把這本書拿去你的房間。」 bring usually means movement toward the speaker/destination being focused on:

> “Bring the book here.”

「把書拿過來。」

So:

take = 帶走 / 拿去

bring = 帶來 / 拿來

Important distinction: take vs get

take

often means:

> deliberately pick up, carry, choose, accept, or use.

is much broader:

> obtain, receive, become, arrive, understand, etc.

can mean catch/board it in some varieties, but the focus differs.

Important distinction: take vs accept accept specifically means:

> agree to receive or approve something.

take

can mean accept, but is much broader.

> “She accepted the offer.”

more formal/precise.

> “She took the offer.”

can sound more conversational depending on context.

Important distinction: take advice vs listen to advice

listen to advice

= hear and consider it.

take advice

= usually suggests actually accepting/following it.

So:

> listening does not guarantee action.

Important distinction: take time vs spend time

something takes time

= the activity requires time.

> "Learning takes time."

someone spends time doing something

= a person uses their time on it.

> "She spends time reading."

This is an important grammar difference.

Important distinction: take a break vs rest

= temporarily stop an activity.

= relax physically/mentally.

A break may involve rest, but not necessarily.

Important distinction: take place vs happen

Both mean:

> 發生

But take place is often slightly more formal and is especially common for planned events:

> “The ceremony will take place tomorrow.”

Happen is broader and very natural for unplanned events.

Important distinction: take part vs join take part in

= participate in an activity.

join

= become part of a group/activity.

> “She joined the club.”

> “She took part in the competition.”

Important distinction: take responsibility vs be responsible be responsible for

= have responsibility.

take responsibility for = actively accept or acknowledge responsibility.

The second highlights acceptance.

Important distinction: take seriously vs believe take something seriously

= treat it as important and deserving attention.

= think it is true.

You may take a warning seriously without being completely sure it is true.

Important distinction: take something as X vs think X

take something as X

= interpret a sign/action/comment as having a certain meaning.

> “I took her silence as agreement.”

think X

= hold a belief/opinion.

The first specifically focuses on interpretation.

Important distinction: take for granted vs assume

These can overlap but are not identical.

assume

= believe something without proof.

> “I assumed she was at home.”

take for granted

can mean:

1. assume something is true without checking; or
2. fail to appreciate someone/something because it is always available.

Your passage uses sense 2.

> “I take her presence for granted.”

= 我因為她一直都在，而沒有充分珍惜她。

Important distinction: take someone for granted vs take something for granted

Someone:

> “Don’t take your parents for granted.”

= 不要因為父母一直都在就不懂珍惜他們。

Something:

> “We take electricity for granted.”

= 我們常把電力供應視為理所當然。

The underlying concept is the same.

Important distinction: take for granted — two branches

This deserves special attention.

1. assume as true without question

> “I took it for granted that he would come.”

「我想當然地認為他一定會來。」

2. fail to appreciate

> “Don’t take her kindness for granted.”

「不要把她的善意視為理所當然而不懂珍惜。」

Your sentence uses branch 2.

Important distinction: take medicine vs eat medicine

In standard English:

> take medicine

not normally:

> eat medicine ❌

Even if the medicine is swallowed, English uses take.

Important distinction: take an exam vs pass an exam***

take an exam***

= sit/participate in it.

pass an exam***

= succeed.

Taking an exam does not mean passing it.

Important distinction: take a photo vs make a photo***

Standard English normally says:

> make a photo.

Important distinction: take control vs control***

control***

= already exercise control.

take control***

= transition into having control.

So take often contributes the meaning:

> begin to possess / obtain a state or role

Family-extension note

Take is one of the richest high-frequency English verbs. Its many uses should not all be treated as unrelated meanings. A useful way to organize them is around several semantic cores:

* physically obtain/move → take a cup, take something upstairs

* carry/transport → take someone home, take the bus

* accept/receive → take money, take advice

* use/consume → take medicine

* require/use resources → take time, take energy

* choose → take the blue one, take a route

* interpret/respond → take something as..., take seriously, take offence

* begin/undertake an action or state → take action, take responsibility, take control

* fixed lexicalized expressions → take place, take part, take for granted

This is exactly the kind of word where the manual's “broad search, conservative split” principle matters: we should search widely, but group predictable constructions when they share a semantic core rather than inventing dozens of unrelated senses.

For your original sentence

> “As she gets older, I try not to take her presence for granted, because I know that one day these visits will become memories...”

The exact meaning is:

take someone/something for granted = 因為某人 / 某事一直存在，而逐漸覺得這是理所當然，因而沒有充分珍惜

So:

> take her presence for granted

= 「因為外婆現在仍然在身邊，就不自覺地覺得她會一直都在，因而沒有好好珍惜她的陪伴」

The emotional contrast is:

> presence now → something easily taken for granted > memory later → something you may wish you had valued more

So take here does not mean:

- * 拿
- * 帶
- * 乘坐
- * 花時間
- * 接受

It belongs to the fixed idiomatic construction:

> take X for granted

and specifically the “fail to appreciate” branch.
