MCQ-ready definition:

Important distinction 1: window vs glass

A window is the whole structure/opening.

Glass is the material.

> The window is open.

窗戶開着。

> The glass is cracked.

玻璃裂了。

So:

window ≠ glass

Important distinction 2: window vs opening

window

a specific architectural feature, usually with glass.

opening

any gap or hole.

> a window in the wall

牆上的窗戶

> an opening in the wall

牆上的開口

An opening need not be a window.

Important distinction 3: window vs door

Both allow passage/access in different ways.

window

mainly lets in:

- * light
- * air
- * view

door

mainly lets:

- * people
- * animals
- * objects

pass through.

Your passage uses window because the metaphor focuses on fresh air entering, not physical entry of a person.

Important distinction 4: window of opportunity vs opportunity

opportunity

any favourable chance.

window of opportunity

a favourable chance that exists only for a limited period.

So window adds the important idea:

the chance can open and then close

Important distinction 5: window into vs view of view of what you can physically see.

> a view of the sea

海景

window into a figurative way of gaining understanding.

> a window into his mind

了解他思想的一扇窗口

So window into is strongly metaphorical.

Important distinction 6: browser window vs tab

These are not the same.

a separate browser/application frame.

tab

one page inside that browser window.

One browser window may contain many tabs.

Important distinction 7: window shopping does not mean buying through a window

It means:

looking at goods, usually in shop windows, without necessarily buying

So it is a lexicalized compound and should not be interpreted word-by-word too literally.

Important distinction 8: window dressing literal vs figurative

Literal

shop display arrangement:

> professional window dressing

櫥窗陳列

Figurative

superficial cosmetic change:

> The reform is only window dressing.

改革只是表面功夫。

This is a genuine figurative lexical extension.

Important distinction 9: window vs window frame

window

the whole window structure.

window frame

the surrounding structural frame.

So:

> paint the window frame

漆窗框

not necessarily the glass.

Important distinction 10: physical window vs computer window

The computer sense is metaphorical:

physical window lets you see through into another space

→ computer window lets you see/interact with another document/program space

This is now fully lexicalized and very common.

Family-extension note

Window has a clear concrete core:

an opening that gives access to light, air, or a view

From that physical idea, several modern figurative senses develop naturally:

1. physical window

- * open a window
- * look out of a window

2. display

- * shop window
- * window shopping
- * window dressing

3. limited period

- * window of opportunity
- * time window
- * transfer window

4. access to understanding

- * window into someone's mind
- * window on the past

5. computing

- * browser window
- * pop-up window

The common metaphor is very strong:

a window gives access to something beyond itself

—physically, temporally, intellectually, or digitally.

For your original sentence

> Being with him feels like opening a window and letting fresh air into a stuffy room.

Here:

window = 窗戶

The word itself is literal.

But the whole image is metaphorical:

stuffy room

→ open the window

→ fresh air enters

→ the room feels different

Likewise:

adult routine

→ spend time with Leo

→ imagination and freshness return

→ life feels less dull

So the natural Traditional Chinese remains:

> 和他相處，就像打開一扇*窗戶*，讓新鮮空氣進入一個悶焗的房間。

And the deeper metaphor is:

Leo is like a window that opens adult life to freshness, imagination, and a different perspective.
