我們應該功勞歸功勞，該肯定誰就肯定誰。

Practice 2

> Credit where credit is due—the junior employee solved the problem.

該給的功勞要給，這個問題其實是那名初級員工解決的。

MCQ-ready definition:

give credit where credit is due = 公平地把肯定和功勞給真正作出貢獻的人

Important distinction 1: credit vs praise

praise express admiration or approval.

credit

acknowledge that someone deserves recognition for a result or contribution.

> praise someone for working hard

> 讚賞某人努力 > give someone credit for the idea

> 承認想法是某人的功勞

So credit is more about attribution of achievement.

Important distinction 2: credit vs recognition recognition

broad acknowledgment of someone's work/value.

credit

often specifically identifies who deserves the achievement or contribution.

In teamwork:

> contribution → recognition/credit

But credit has a stronger “who gets the 功勞?” nuance.

Important distinction 3: credit vs contribution

Central to your passage.

contribution

what someone actually adds.

credit

the recognition they receive for it.

The teamwork problem is:

contribution can be unequal while credit is equal.

That is precisely what the writer criticizes.

Important distinction 4: credit vs reward

credit

acknowledgment.

reward

something given because of achievement, such as:

- * money,
- * prize,
- * benefit.

You can receive credit without receiving a material reward.

Important distinction 5: take credit vs deserve credit

take credit

accept or claim that something is your achievement.

deserve credit

actually merit recognition.

Someone may take credit without deserving it.

Important distinction 6: credit someone with vs credit something to Direction matters.

Person first:

- > credit Kevin with solving the problem
- > 把解決問題的功勞歸給 Kevin

Result first:

- > credit the success to teamwork
- > 把成功歸功於團隊合作

Useful grammar contrast.

Important distinction 7: credit to vs due to

credit X to Y

often positive attribution:

> credit success to teamwork be due to Y

neutral cause:

> delay was due to traffic

Credit to often suggests praise or favorable causal attribution.

Important distinction 8: to someone's credit

This does not mean money has been deposited into their account.

> To her credit, she apologised.

means:

值得稱讚的是，她道歉了。 **

Context completely changes the meaning.

Important distinction 9: credit financial vs credit account entry

Financial borrowing:

> obtain credit

> 取得信貸

Accounting/banking:

> credit an account

> 把款項記入帳戶

Related historically, but distinct learner senses.

Important distinction 10: credit vs debit

In accounting/banking these are paired technical terms.

Very broadly:

credit

money recorded on the credit side / added depending on account context.

debit money recorded on the debit side / deducted depending on account context.

The exact accounting effect depends on the type of account, so avoid treating credit = always money in in formal bookkeeping.

For everyday bank statements, however:

> account credited usually means money has been added.

Important distinction 11: academic credit vs grade

grade

how well you performed.

credit

how much completed study counts toward a qualification.

You can:

- * receive a high grade,
- * earn three credits.

Different measurement systems.

Important distinction 12: academic credit vs course course

the unit of study.

credit

the numerical/unit value awarded for completing study.

One course may be worth several credits.

Important distinction 13: credits in a film vs credit for achievement

Film:

- > closing credits
- > 製作人員名單

Achievement:

- > receive credit
- > 得到功勞

The connection is attribution: film credits identify who contributed to the work.

Important distinction 14: credited as vs credited with credited as + role

- > credited as producer
- > 署名為製作人 credited with + achievement

- > credited with creating the design
- > 被認為創作了這個設計

Very useful distinction.

Important distinction 15: equal credit in your passage

Here, equal credit does not mean:

- * equal bank credit,
- * equal university credits,
- * equal amount deposited.

It means:

all group members receive roughly the same recognition for the final work, regardless of how much they actually contributed

That mismatch is the whole criticism.

Family-extension note

Credit has several genuinely distinct modern branches:

1. recognition / achievement

- * receive credit
- * give credit
- * take credit

2. attribution

- * credit someone with X
- * credit X to Y

3. commendation

- * to someone's credit
- * a credit to the team

4. finance / borrowing

- * credit
- * credit limit
- * credit history

5. banking/accounting

- * credit an account

* credit balance

6. education

* academic credit

* earn credits

7. media attribution

* opening/closing credits

* credited as

* photo credit

8. finance family

* creditor

* creditworthy

For your passage, the exact branch is:

credit = recognition or 功勞 given for contributing to the group's final result

For your original sentence

> ...another may merely read from the script on the day itself and still receive equal credit.

Here:

*equal credit = 雖然實際投入和貢獻遠少於其他組員，最後卻得到同樣程度的功勞、肯定或成果認可

A natural Traditional Chinese rendering is:

> 另一名成員可能只是在當天照着稿讀，卻仍然得到同等的*功勞 / 認可*。

This paragraph gives us a particularly useful four-way distinction:

- > effort = 你投入多少心力
- > contribution = 你實際為團隊加入多少價值
- > performance = 你做得有多好
- > credit = 最後有多少功勞和認可歸到你身上

The writer's complaint is precisely that these four things can become disconnected in badly managed group work: low effort + low contribution can still receive equal credit.
