A market can be lively even if prices are not rising strongly.

Family-extension note

Lively has a very coherent semantic structure built around:

full of energy, movement, expression, or activity

The main branches are:

1. person

* lively teacher

* lively child

2. interaction/event

- * lively discussion
- * lively lesson

3. place/atmosphere

- * lively area
- * lively atmosphere

4. artistic expression

- * lively music
- * lively writing
- * lively colours

5. mental quality

- * lively imagination
- * lively interest

6. economic/activity level

- * lively market
- * lively trade

So the word remains semantically connected across contexts, but the Chinese rendering changes naturally depending on what is being described.

For your original sentence

> However, once he started teaching, he became much more lively than people expected.

Here:

lively = 生動活潑、有活力、有感染力的

The contrast is important:

> at first sight → he looked serious

> once he started teaching → he became lively

So lively is describing the change in his teaching manner, not necessarily his whole personality outside class.

A natural Traditional Chinese rendering is:

> 不過，他一開始教書，就比大家想像中生動活潑得多。

For this passage, 「生動活潑」 captures the nuance particularly well.
