Important distinction 1: planner as object vs planner as person

This is the central polysemy split.

Object:

> I bought a planner.

我買了一本計劃本。

Person:

> She's an event planner.

她是一名活動策劃人。

Same spelling, completely different referent.

Important distinction 2: paper planner vs digital planner

paper planner

physical notebook/calendar.

digital planner

software, app, or electronic document.

Both perform the same organizational function, but the object type changes.

Important distinction 3: planner vs diary

In BrE, there can be overlap.

planner

emphasizes organising future tasks, deadlines, and schedules.

diary

can mean an appointment diary, but also a personal journal recording past experiences.

So:

> planner = 偏向「規劃未來」

> diary = 可以是「行程簿」，也可以是「日記」

For your passage, planner clearly means the organizational type.

Important distinction 4: planner vs calendar

calendar

shows dates and often appointments.

planner

usually provides more space or structure for:

- * tasks,
- * priorities,
- * deadlines,
- * notes,

* goals.

A planner often contains a calendar, but it is usually more than just a calendar.

Important distinction 5: planner vs notebook

notebook

general blank or lined book for writing.

planner

specifically structured for organization and scheduling.

Your Traditional Chinese passage uses 記事簿, which is natural, but the English planner carries a stronger planning/scheduling function than a generic notebook.

Important distinction 6: planner vs organizer

planner

can be a scheduling book/tool or a professional/person who plans.

organizer

can also be a person or organizational tool, but often emphasizes arranging things rather than advance scheduling.

There is overlap, but they are not interchangeable in all compounds:

> wedding planner

> urban planner

> route planner

Important distinction 7: event planner vs event organizer

They strongly overlap.

event planner

emphasizes design and advance planning.

event organizer

often emphasizes overall arrangement and execution.

In practice, the job titles may overlap heavily.

Important distinction 8: urban planner / town planner are professional titles

These do not simply mean:

> “someone who is good at planning cities.”

They refer to established professional roles concerned with land use and development.

Important distinction 9: financial planner vs accountant

financial planner

helps structure future financial goals and strategies.

accountant

focuses more on accounts, financial records, reporting, and tax-related work.

They may work together but are different professions.

Important distinction 10: route planner as tool, not necessarily person

> a route planner

most commonly refers to:

a program/service that calculates a route

not a human being whose job is planning routes.

Context and compound conventions matter.

Important distinction 11: planner is countable

Correct:

- > a planner
- > two planners

But the meaning depends on context:

- > two planners on my desk > = 兩本計劃本
- > two planners working on the event
> = 兩名策劃人員

This creates a neat MCQ ambiguity.

Family-extension note

Keeping strictly to planner, without reopening plan, the word has three main modern semantic branches:

1. physical organizational tool

- * planner
- * daily planner
- * student planner

2. human professional / person who organizes ahead

- * event planner
- * financial planner
- * urban planner
- * media planner

3. digital or functional planning tool

- * digital planner
- * route planner
- * journey planner
- * meal planner

The semantic link is consistent:

planner = something or someone whose function is to organize things in advance

But for learners these should still be separated because the referent changes dramatically:

> book/tool ↔ person ↔ software/function

Master comparison

For your original sentence

> I bought a simple planner, started writing down deadlines, broke large tasks into smaller steps...

Here:

planner = 一本有日期、日程、待辦事項等欄位，用來安排時間和記錄截止期限的實體計劃

本

A natural Traditional Chinese rendering is:

> 我買了一本很簡單的記事簿 / 計劃本，開始寫下所有截止日期.....

The cleanest polysemy distinction for planner itself is:

> planner = 計劃本

> planner = 策劃 / 規劃工作的專業人士

> planner = 電子或網上規劃工具

And in this passage, it is unequivocally the first sense: a personal scheduling notebook/tool.
