Important distinction 1: recognise vs remember

recognise

see/hear something now and know you have encountered it before.

remember

bring past information or experience back into your mind.

> I recognise her face, but I don't remember her name.

我*認得她的樣貌*，但*記不起她的名字*。

Very important distinction.

Important distinction 2: recognise vs know

know someone have familiarity or a relationship with them.

recognise someone identify who they are when seeing/hearing them.

> I recognise the actor, but I don't know him personally.

我認得那位演員，但我並不認識他本人。

Important distinction 3: recognise vs identify

recognise

often relies on previous familiarity.

identify determine exactly who or what something is.

You can identify an unknown species using a guide without having previously “recognised” it from memory.

Important distinction 4: recognise vs notice

notice

become aware that something is there.

recognise

correctly identify or understand what it is.

> I noticed a face in the crowd.

> 我注意到人群中有一張臉。

> I recognised the face.

> 我認出了那張臉。

Important distinction 5: recognise vs realise realise become aware of a fact, often suddenly.

recognise

acknowledge or accept a fact, problem, value, etc.

They overlap:

> recognise that communication is important

> 承認 / 認識到溝通很重要

> realise that I made a mistake

> 意識到自己犯了錯

Recognise often carries stronger acknowledgment.

Important distinction 6: recognise vs acknowledge acknowledge openly admit or accept something.

recognise

can mean acknowledge, but also includes understanding its importance/status.

> acknowledge a mistake

> 承認錯誤

> recognise the importance of the mistake

> 認識到錯誤的重要影響

Important distinction 7: recognise vs appreciate recognise the value accept that value exists.

appreciate the value

understand and often personally value it more deeply.

Your passage says teamwork has:

> recognised value

meaning its usefulness is broadly accepted, even by people who may not enjoy it.

Important distinction 8: recognise achievement vs praise

recognise achievement

give acknowledgment or credit.

praise

express approval or admiration directly.

An organisation can recognise achievement by:

- * giving an award,
- * promotion,
- * public mention,

without necessarily using verbal praise.

Important distinction 9: recognised as vs recognised for recognised as + identity/status

- > recognised as an expert
- > 公認為專家

recognised for + achievement/quality

- > recognised for her contribution
- > 因貢獻而獲得肯定

Excellent grammar distinction.

Important distinction 10: recognise that vs recognise as

Fact:

- > recognise that teamwork is valuable

承認團隊合作有價值

Classification:

- > recognise teamwork as an important skill

把團隊合作視為 / 認定為重要技能

Important distinction 11: recognised does not always mean officially approved

> a widely recognised problem means:

一個廣泛被承認存在的問題

It does not necessarily involve any formal authority.

By contrast:

> officially recognised qualification

does involve institutional approval.

Important distinction 12: recognition = identification vs recognition = praise

Compare:

> facial recognition

> 人面識別

> recognition for her work

> 對她工作的肯定 / 表揚

Same noun, completely different semantic branch.

Important distinction 13: recognition vs award

recognition

the acknowledgment itself.

award

a specific prize or honour.

An award is one way of giving recognition.

Important distinction 14: recognisable vs familiar

recognisable

you can identify it.

familiar

it seems known because you have encountered it before.

Something may look familiar without being recognisable enough for you to say exactly what it is.

Important distinction 15: recognisable vs distinctive

recognisable

easy to identify.

distinctive has features that make it noticeably different from others.

Distinctive features often make something recognisable.

Important distinction 16: beyond recognition

This does not mean:

> beyond receiving praise.

Here recognition means visual identification.

So:

> changed beyond recognition

= changed so much that the original thing can hardly be identified.

Family-extension note

The recognise family has several major modern branches:

1. identify from familiarity

- * recognise a person
- * recognise a voice

2. detect patterns/signs

- * recognise a pattern
- * recognise symptoms

3. acknowledge reality/value

- * recognise that...
- * recognise the importance of
- * recognised value

4. acknowledge achievement

- * recognise contribution
- * recognition for work

5. official/legal acceptance

- * recognised qualification
- * recognise a government

6. identifiability

- * recognisable
- * unrecognisable

7. technology

- * face recognition
- * speech recognition
- * pattern recognition

For your passage, the exact branch is:

recognised = generally acknowledged and accepted as having real value

For your original sentence

> Yet, despite its recognised value, teamwork is often met with reluctance rather than enthusiasm.

Here:

recognised value = 團隊合作的好處和重要性已經被企業、管理者和一般職場觀念廣泛承認

But the sentence deliberately creates a contrast:

> people recognise its value

> people necessarily enjoy doing it

A natural Traditional Chinese rendering is:

> 然而，儘管團隊合作的價值早已獲得廣泛認可，員工對它往往仍抱有抗拒，而不是熱情。

The cleanest contrast is:

- > recognise someone = 認出某人
- > recognise a fact/value = 承認 / 認識到某事
- > recognise achievement = 肯定 / 表揚成就
- > officially recognise = 正式認可

For this passage, recognised means “widely acknowledged as valid or valuable,” not “physically identified.”
